With the recent onset of attacks like last week’s WannaCry ransomware, the unprecedented malware attack swept the globe late last week, and security researchers estimated that nearly 57,000 computers in more than 150 countries were infected by the end of the day on Friday. While the spread of this terrifying ransomware has slowed, it still impacted more than 230,000 systems around the world and new, more potent, versions are already emerging. We need to be vigilant and update software and take the utmost precautions to protect ourselves, our enterprises and our companies from future attack.”
